Upon becoming Minister for Correctional Services in early 2016, three statistics stood out as key indicators of the substantial challenge facing our prison system.

The first, was the fact that the prison population is growing at 6.01% per year. The second, is that over 75% of our current prison population have been in prison at least once before. And finally, that the rate of reoffending is 46%.

Reoffending has substantial costs for our community. It means more crime, more victims and more expense to the taxpayer through costly court proceedings and incarceration. However, a reduction in reoffending means a safer community and frees up Government resources to invest in more productive community services, like schools and hospitals.

For these reasons, the rate of reoffending must be a key performance indicator of our criminal justice system. In August last year, the State Government set a bold target to reduce the rate of reoffending by 10% by 2020, and following a near-12 month review of the State's correctional system, we are now driving a fundamental shift in corrections policy.

This document is a blueprint for achieving the reoffending reduction target. The strategy has been informed by the work of the independent panel, Chaired by Mr Nyunggai Warren Mundine, and accepts all six themes and 36 recommendations put forward by the panel.

Almost over $40 million, including $28 million in new funding, is being invested in reducing the rate of reoffending by 10% by 2020 which underpins a whole-of-system change in offender management.

If the target is realised, SA will become a national leader. Our new approach is built upon factors that prevent reoffending – supportive accommodation, employment and community support.

The reality is that the majority of people in prison will be released, which means that successful transition from prison back into the community is paramount.

While the Government will ensure that dangerous criminals that need to be locked up will be, focusing on rehabilitation will result in less crimes being committed, fewer victims and the saving of taxpayer dollars.

This fundamental policy shift will not only mean fewer victims of crime but will also provide real opportunity for offenders to turn their lives around.

The Department for Correctional Services and I will now work swiftly to implement this strategy and realise our target.

TO BE INTRODUCED

“ South Australia's prison population has had a decade of sustained growth. If we can reduce the rate of reoffending in South Australia, we will create a safer community with fewer victims and less crime. ”

It's time to take a smarter path and stop the revolving door of our prisons.
